Use FaceBook To Save Gas & Meet Friends Work Days Productive

In the past, many of our out-of-town friends and supporters have asked us to put them in touch with others in their area who share our Naturist values. Because of our strict policy to safeguard the privacy of all our supporters, this has been difficult for us to assist with.

With our presence on FaceBook, now this can be easily accomplished by everyone. Just "friend" us on and post a call to share a ride or other message. With this communications assistance, we hope our supporters from Nebraska, Iowa, Oklahoma, Wichita, Missouri and elsewhere will be able to visit us more often.

Lake Edun can be found on FaceBook either by entering Lake Edun into the FaceBook search bar or by going to www.facebook.com/lakeedun. Try it. You'll find a whole group of our supporters there from all over the country.

Summer Schedule Taking Shape

For your Board of Directors, Winter is the busy season. We have been busy making plans for this summer. In addition to the major holidays: Memorial Day, Independence Day, and Labor Day we have been trying to develop events for some of the other weekends. Here is a sampling.

Each month, we will recognize the birthdays of Eduners who celebrate their milestone during that month. Plan to be there to enjoy cake and meet others who share your astrological sign. Dates set aside for this will be May 21, June 18, July 19, August 13, and September 10.

The survey many of our supporters completed a few months ago showed overwhelming interest in a Family Day. This is scheduled for June 4. We remind all our members that their children under 18 are included FREE in their membership and hope they will plan to bring their spouse, girl/boy friend (not both please), and children to our family day on June 12.

The survey also showed continued interest in our Open Houses. They are scheduled for May 14, June 11, July 9, and August 6. Let your friends know about these. They are a great time to visit without fear of seeing anyone naked or having to make a full-body commitment.

Circumstances may have changed for some who have visited in the past and are no longer be able to visit as often. They are anxious to renew old friendships or see all the changes that have taken place. For them, we have planned a Reunion the weekend of June 18-19. Please help us get this word out to those who may be interested.

One of our new student members, Forrest, has offered to organize a Tie Dye Day June 25 day and a Drum Circle July 23. Bring a cotton article you wish to make into an original.

Watch the schedule. We will have another walking tour led by our Arborist; a visit from the Dermatologist, Home brew competition, Body Painting and more. Don't miss it.

So far this Spring, we have had two work days which have been extremely productive. Weather has been cool (or worse) at both of these events. This has not slowed our energetic workers.

Effort has been focused on clearing a path that will define the North Road. It is completed to the west and some progress has been made toward the south. Long time supporters will recall this has been a multi-year project that will improve access to and use of some portions of our special place few have even seen.

Special recognition should be extended to a group of fun-loving Eduners who enjoy some hard work. Thank you Jerome, Dennis and Darryl for your many hours of effort on this project.

Future work days will continue this project and also work on some of the projects specifically required to get our special place hospitable once the warm weather finally arrives.

Plan to join us for one of our work days. Most find the effort rewarding. Check the schedule and show up. Everyone can help out in some manner.

Items We Need

Every month, we run a brief listing of some of the items we can use to make our special place even better. We hope our supporters take a minute to review this for things they may have or have access to. Thank you Daryl for the drill. This month we added work gloves. Please check this periodically to see if you can help us out. Your generosity is appreciated.

From The Mail Bag

Dear Lake Edun,

With summer 2001 on its way, I know we are all looking forward to another great year at our away-from-it-all special place to get away.

With our 2 sandy beaches overlooking our nice 10 acre lake, relaxing naked in the warm sun and getting that all-over body suntan is what we all like. The lake is a great place to swim, boat or fish. To get my walking exercise, I like to walk Edun's nature trails that go all around the lake.

Also, camping overnite is great. Lots of neat places to pitch your tent. All places have fire pits. Most people favor South Beach.

Here is my money order of $275 for membership. High gas prices don't help but it should be another good year. Send me the Bare Facts every month and my membership card and all.

A Flower By Any Other Name

Human creativity is a wonder. It is all around us, so much so that we take it for granted, or think pretty much everything has already been thought of or done. Far from it.

Artists, among others, keep producing new things or variations on old things. In this case, creativity and body acceptance come together in a delightful manner.

For your viewing and artistic pleasure, go to this link to read the full story and see a number of examples of the artist's work. [Ed.] <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1361846/Unveiled-Beautiful-flowers-naked-bodies.html>.

There is more to artist Cecelia Webber's colorful flower pictures than meets the eye. The observer of her work at first believes they are looking at a beautiful, but otherwise ordinary still life of flowers. But the brain has been fooled by this expectation. Suddenly, the messages the eye has been sending the brain are correctly decoded and reveal that each intricate part is a naked human body or at least part of one.

Webber takes photos of naked people and then spends hundreds of hours on her computer transforming them into her stunning floral creations.

Her models are carefully posed to produce the shapes she requires and then Cecelia digitally cuts, rotates and colors the bodies and limbs to create her finished images.

The result is the creation of incredibly realistic blue bells, dandelions, maple leaves, sunflowers and cherry blossoms, among many others.

The inspiration for her creative images was serendipity; she was taking a series of nude photographs and was struck by one that looked a great deal like a petal. This led her to wonder if she could create a full flower from a series of these images, and began experimenting from there.

She hopes her works will encourage people to think differently about nudity and their own bodies. She explains that, 'Nudity is sometimes thought of as shameful thing, inspiring guilt or fear, but I hope to encourage people to think differently about their own bodies.'

Stripping In The Amazon

It may be better to be underdressed than overdressed when hunting with the Awa, one of the Amazon's last nomadic people, according to a BBC reporter visiting a remote tribal area in Brazil. The reporter and film crew were on hand to accompany local Awa tribesmen on a hunt in the jungle. The Awa are a tribal group that was only contacted by the outside world twelve years ago.

The reporter, dressed in typical western garb of hiking boots, jeans and shirt discovered he really wasn't appropriately dressed for the hot, humid jungle conditions. Even a short walk was enough to work up a heavy sweat. Entering the village, he realized just how overdressed he was.

The purpose of the news story was to show how the global demand for Brazil's resources, in particular from China, is driving deforestation. In the short period of time of contact the virgin forest has fallen to the loggers and the land is the most degraded of any indigenous tribe in the Amazon.

Walking into the village it became abundantly clear some hunting traditions remain strong. The Awa hunters were completely naked except for a piece of string decorated with bright bird feathers tied to the end of their penises.

They looked at me in my sweaty shirt and jeans and laughed. One motioned towards my groin and gestured as if he were tying a knot. The others laughed even harder. Clearly, they thought I should dress more appropriately.

"I am not wearing one of those and that's the end of it," I said. I turned, perhaps a trifle petulantly, and stomped off into the forest behind one of the hunters.

Returning from the hunt everyone was drenched in sweat. We came upon a river that runs through the Awa territory and the hunters indicated that they were about to take a dip.

Checking to see the coast was clear, the reporter stripped off and dived in too. "The Awa seemed delighted that at last I was surrendering to the spirit of the hunt."

Noticing one of the young hunters on the bank brandishing a piece of string, the reporter guessed what was coming next and eventually gave in to the prank and was "dressed" in traditional Awa hunting garb. All to be recorded by the film crew who suddenly appeared.

So much for the dignity of the reporter. For the full story see: http://newsvote.bbc.co.uk/mpapps/pagetools/print/news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/programmes/from_our_own_correspondent/9413908.stm For video of the "dressing" incident go to: <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-12649955>

This humorous story, on one level, shows the total silliness of our clothing compulsive way of life, and that the practical and harmless nudity of tribal peoples is utterly sensible. Just once, could textiles show some humility and bow to the wisdom of peoples that have survived for thousands of years in the jungle environment? Get naked, get over it!

It just seems that when anyone makes contact with tribal peoples, bad things happen. Five hundred years since Columbus reached the Americas and we continue to rape and pillage the land and the people that live on it. When all of nature is gone, what will we have left? [Ed.]

A Breast's Best Friend

Isn't it fascinating that after 500 years of Western art, not to mention art from around the world, we still agonize about the nude human body? It's an amazingly long run on one subject. After so many centuries you would think the audience would get bored. You know, get used to it – in a been there, done that, bought the T-Shirt, sort of way. Yet, it never does! That's freaky!

I suspect that at least in the West, the last 500 years has not been a long enough time for society to let go of the anti-sexual, body phobic attitudes and supporting beliefs that originated in medieval times. In other words, The Dark Ages!

The result of denigrating the body as a source of evil has been an unrelenting combination of repression, misinformation, disinformation, ignorance, prurience, and untold misery and suffering for millions. What a ghastly and misguided heritage we share and pass on to our children.

Through their art, artists have been trying to lift the heavy curtain of ignorance and disparagement from the human body. There has been some success in some circles, but art hasn't been, "a game changer" in the cause of restoring the lost valuation of the body as our natural heritage. Still, I'm glad those with creative vision and skill still try to "open our eyes" to the beauty, wonder, and value of the unadorned natural body.

Artist Clarity Haynes is one of those artists who have zeal to be real in their art. For the last twelve years she has been painting hundreds of portraits of breasts in a realistic style. Most recently, her paintings have become larger than life in the hope that people will really see the beauty that she sees.

She calls her art show – "Radical Acceptance" – a title that was inspired by something said by one of her models.

"It can refer to people looking at the art – it's radical to accept something you're not used to seeing," said Haynes, referring to the non-airbrushed, typically older representations of the female body. "But it's really about the models. It's radical to realize you can change your feelings about your body and become powerful in your body."

Haynes paints the "truth" of her models bodies which means lovingly painting blemishes most women would be ashamed of such as stretch marks, veins and the trauma of mastectomies. Through the act of painting, she hopes both models – and viewers – will come to accept real breasts and the life stories they tell as beautiful, too.

It is the artist's hope that viewers will overcome their initial reactions of, 'Oh no, that's horrible, I don't want to see that!' "But what I'm hoping is as they look, gradually, something else will come in, some sense of peace and power."

On departure from the norm is the use of older women as the models. Given our fetish with youthfulness, and ageism taboos toward the bodies of older people, these painting do challenge tradition and our comfort.

Most people can appreciate the beauty of young, firm breasts. The down side for this is that the sexual potential of these breasts likely would overwhelm any other message. Besides, it's been done a million times.

It is obvious that this artist is seeking to shake up people's preconceptions of what constitutes beauty. She is deliberately being confrontational toward our assumptions of what bodies are worthy, and challenges the audience to look beyond the surface, to a deeper meaning of beauty.

Unfortunately, the female writer of the story shows she still doesn't get it. Part of the caption under the photo of the artist reads, "...the Sunset Park artist confronts unrealistic ideals of female beauty by portraying real bodies in all their, um, glory." As the saying goes, beauty is only skin deep, but we can add, stupid goes all the way to the bone!

Therapy Without Even A Freudian Slip

Ok, this is a fluff piece. It's a little light hearted, screwball story that does involve nudity, (we try to stay relevant here) and it's good for a laugh. (Naturists do laugh you know).

Have you ever been to a therapist? It isn't easy to bare your soul to some stranger, even if you are paying them a lot of money. However, one enterprising woman believes she has found a way to break down resistance – getting naked. Not the client mind you, but her! It's not your father's kind of therapist, that's for sure.

It's her theory that by slowly peeling away the layers of her clothes during the session, it will enable her to peel away the layers of her clients' subconscious. "During the sessions I use the power of arousal to let you gain more control over your life."

She explains, "The goal is to use nakedness so you can understand yourself and your world better, so you can feel great and powerful, and so the excitement you feel during the sessions can lead to more excitement outside the sessions."

Having studied psychology while a university under-graduate, she believed there was something missing and uninspiring from her training. That missing something she decided was an open interest in sexuality.

Her sessions are conducted via one-way web cam. She begins the sessions fully clothed, and then gradually strips throughout so that by the end she is completely naked.

Eventually she moves on to two-way Skype video appointments and then, in some cases, in-person consultations.

She states her goal is to show patients she has nothing to hide and this encourages them to be more honest. She believes seeing a naked woman can really help men in particular, focus, look deeply into themselves and speak their minds openly. "Freud used free association. I use nakedness."

She admits that naked therapy is not approved by any mental health association, and that she is not a licensed therapist.

It comes as no surprise that professional psychologists are not sold on her idea.

No doubt this is a cash only business. [Ed.]

This rowing success story is largely publicized because the lone female crewmember of six, Naomi Hoogestege joined her male team mates in rowing nude. Ok, that's noteworthy, but doesn't spending over half the story going on about the crew nudity over-shadow the truly noteworthy accomplishment of rowing across the Atlantic in record time?

The crew wasn't made up of a bunch of naturists. But due to blisters and infected sores forming on clothed buttocks, the only way to treat them was to expose them to sun and air and continue rowing.

She explained, 'It did mean that at times we had to row naked but if that was what was required to break the world record, then there was no choice. I decided to strip naked on day three or four because I had some big sores on my bottom and just thought I had to do it. My crew had stripped off the day before and were just getting on with it.

The Durham University lecturer added, "... when you're part of a team, you have to fit in." "It was a little bit more embarrassing for me as the only woman with five men." The story writer editorialized that, "... although the 29-year-old was keen to save her blushes, eventually she decided the blisters were more painful." What a brave lass.

And just to let us know she didn't enjoy looking at all those men one little bit, "...she added, 'I've seen enough male dangly bits over the last month to last me a lifetime.'" What a trooper, taking one for the team and a world record!

Thankfully, Miss Hoogestege's efforts were worth it. The team broke the world record for the 3,000-mile row.... [Ed.]

Naturist Living Show

I always appreciate interviews and discussion the Naturist Living Show provides. I realize that taking 20 or 30 minutes to listen to a webcast may seem tedious to some. However, while reading the same words has some advantage, I feel hearing the voices of the people involved adds a dimension of understanding and interest written text lacks. [Ed.]

Of the two genders, women get the most pressure from society to meet to unrealistic expectations of physical beauty. That is one of the reason women benefit most from being a naturist but it is also why they have the hardest time trying naturism. For a woman, the idea of being nude in a social setting is fraught with fears related to a lifetime of sexual objectification and subconscious attacks on their self-esteem.

In this episode of the Naturist Living Show, we explore how women in naturism overcame some of these barriers and what they get out of living a naturist life. We also review strategies for convincing someone to try naturism.

Guest Editorial

From the April 1st Naked Truth Naturist newsletter. Tired of being kicked around because you are a naturist? Read on for some strong opinion about what we need to do to stand up for ourselves. [Ed.]

This week [In February – Ed.] we heard from AANR Government Affairs Team volunteer Shirley Gauthier with report of a story too important not to pass on. It seems that Shirley and other volunteers from The Willamettans nudist club in Marcola, Oregon, set up a table alongside other participating members of the area chamber of commerce at an annual event held within a local shopping mall. Within minutes of putting up a tasteful "window shade" type display banner, mall security asked them to take the banner down. Ever diplomatic and cordial, Shirley complied, but she did ask why.

The reason? Its presence had generated a complaint to mall management. But the story doesn't end there. As she lowered the banner, Shirley looked directly across the mall corridor from her location into a full-size window promotion for a well-known chain that sells novelty items. The feature items? A corset "trio" complete with garter belt and skimpy bra – modeled on a poster by a woman wearing the getup and little else while grasping the metal pole on a touring bus. Delightfully surprised men look on, and a girlfriend snaps pictures.

Oh...plus a few adult "novelties" in a briefcase are also on display. Ironic, huh?

You see? This is what I mean by "let's stop apologizing." While Shirley Gauthier is "ever diplomatic and cordial," the mall management effectively gagged her (and [Naturist's]) First Amendment, free speech rights. . . .

I'm sick and tired of folks running around like Chicken Little, knee-jerking all over the place, and whining about "nudity in front of the chilldrennn – making complaints about simple nudity, nude beaches, nudist advertisements, all couched in the moralistic balderdash they probably don't believe in anyway – when our culture inundates them with sexualized, slutty nudity and violence as entertainment. Some of our music is downright despicable, with low-down and dirty sex, obscene lyrics and a downright disrespectful view of women and girls. What passes as video games are rife with violent acts, illegal actions and over-sexualized scenarios.

Our movies, for the most part, only show nudity when it's about sex, (don't even get me started on those frat party and road trip pieces of excrement) and these same people can't seem get up the energy to call in a complaint over them. Even when they do, they often go at it the wrong way, as if we live in a theocracy and not a pluralistic society.

And don't get me started on the porn industry; I could write another entire editorial about it. It's probably the most pernicious and corrupting influence out there and most people wink at what goes on. Yet it ruins lives. It shatters the lives of the performers, who have a death rate several magnitudes higher than the highest crime rate in the worst city in America and usually end up hooked on drugs and alcohol. It destroys the lives of the men, women and kids who view it and the families who suffer from its pernicious residual effects.

While we naturists are being diplomatic and cordial, people are running all over our First Amendment rights. I say it again, if we consider what we believe to be perfectly normal and okay, why do we act as if that weren't the case?

We worry so about causing offence, as naturists and as Christians, (Christ even told us we'd be viewed that way) others have no qualms about running roughshod over our rights as people. Most of the ordinances used to harass naturists – i.e. against lewd, indecent and sexualized acts – don't apply to naturism and simple nudity.

I'm becoming increasingly annoyed at the term, "nude in appropriate places." What does that mean exactly? I think of it in the same vein as "partly pregnant." Who defines this anyhow? . . .

After all, [isn't one of the national organizations] "The credible voice of reason for nude recreation since 1931," another phrase I find vaguely annoying. Please don't take this as an uncompromising slam of [any organization], but we have to drop the mindset that there is anything inappropriate about simple, human nakedness. There's nothing inappropriate about walking downtown naked, shopping at the mall naked, using recreational areas naked, eating at a restaurant, going to a movie theater, or attending a church naked (observing the "towel" rule at all times, of course).

What makes public nudity supposedly inappropriate are senseless laws, restrictive moral thinking and the attitudes they foster in the population at large. Of course, common sense must prevail if we, as naturists, wish to avoid jail time. What's more, there's no law, or inalienable right extant that says people have a right NOT to be offended.

Offense is entirely subjective. WE choose to be offended; WE make up the internal, "don't you dare cross that line" landscape. If something someone sees offends him or her and is not lewd, obscene and indecent (and don't tell me we have no way of measuring that), they have the option of simply looking the other way.

The so-called authorities, (both public and private) have a very subjective way of dealing with non-sexual, simple nudity themselves. Just let them receive certain complaints and they'll tell you they have to weigh how many they've received to determine if it's actionable. But let just ONE complaint come about simple nudity, a sign advocating nudism/naturism, or a tasteful non-explicit photo appear and they're all over it. I'm constantly appalled that one or two complaints can get law-enforcement in a twist, forcing dozens of others to hew to their beefs. Where's our personal freedom here?

A while back, the Pasco County nudist parks had a campaign utilizing $2 bills, to emphasize just how many nudists frequented the surrounding businesses. They were saying, "We're nudists, we spend money too, and we vote." I think it's time we stopped going around begging permission for every little thing we do. Simple, family-friendly, non-sexual and non-titillating, (what a great word!) nudity is just that: a non-issue. There's absolutely nothing wrong with anyone, children included, seeing it.

Let's start looking at the world around us as our world too – and start demonstrating by being nude wherever we can find a place for however brief a time. If you're not the activist type, SUPPORT those who are, whether they be a Stephen Gough, a Vincent Bethell, a Claudia Kellersch (Hi, Claudia!), or the guy next door/down the street, who mows his lawn in the buff.

In fact, find a way to do so yourself, if at all possible!

Despite all the doomsayers, and those screeching voices of self-appointed probity, we can be nude as a lifestyle more than we think. Start in your own home. Refuse to pull the drapes. Use your backyard nude whenever possible, even if the neighbors can see you at times.

Once, while speaking with a next-door neighbor, she told me, "There's a guy a couple of houses over who walked through his backyard 'Sandy Hook naked,' as casual as you please." I informed her that I was that guy! She showed surprise, but wasn't offended. See? During the early afternoon of some hotter days, I sometimes mowed the lawn in the buff, in full view of three neighbors' houses, (knowing them not to be at home at that hour). Ahhh!

On every front, we're seeing things press against the gains we've made in the past. I'm not advocating we make total pains of ourselves, but there's nothing wrong with alerting the neighbors about possible nudity on our side of the fence out of courtesy; or in asking others if our nudity offends them when we're free-hiking, or using a favorite swimming hole, or hot spring in the nude.

Sometimes, as in Brattleboro, where some local teens went nude and a gentleman I know personally walked downtown to the hardware store to test the nude waters, we need to push the envelope. That man's foray prompted a temporary ordinance banning nudity downtown, but it expired and you can still skinny-dip anywhere in Vermont. At least he established the parameters for the future.

I feel that a combination of common-sense (altogether too UNcommon at times) thinking, courtesy, and pushing the envelope whenever the opportunity presents itself, will do more than all the legislation and ordinances (which are good to pursue, as well) legislative groups can come up with.

A combination of all these are, in my view, the antidote to the ant-nudity crowd. Here in America in the Twenty-first Century, it's time naturists desensitized people to simple nudity and popped Hollywood's bubble over the "perfect" body-type. After all, naked is just what we look like without clothes. Those in a fever-sweat over it need a cold soak in a tub of ice cubes.

To cop a phrase from the feminist movement: "I am nudist – see me RAW!"

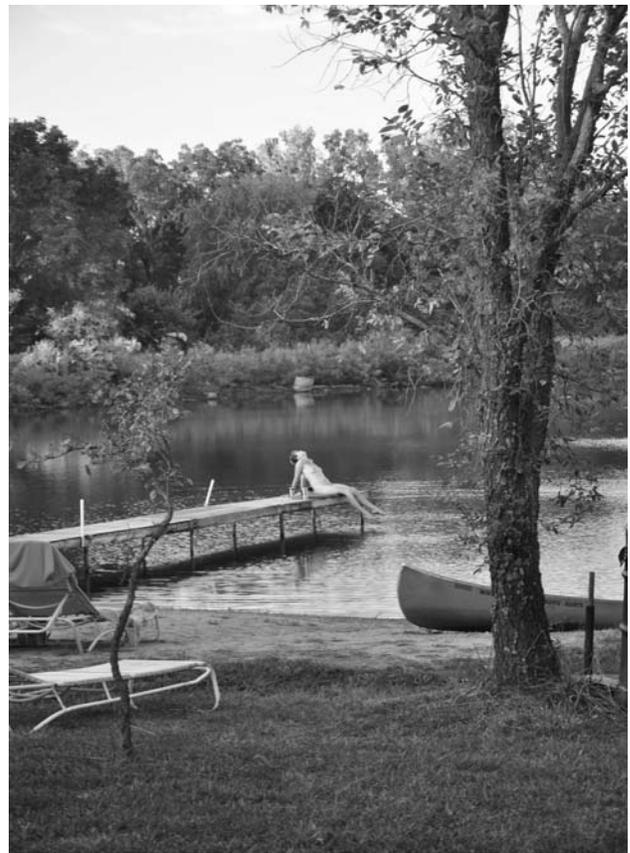

Remember Summer

Just when Cabin Fever seems to be everywhere, we are reminded how peaceful it can be to sit on the end of the dock and appreciate the healing strength of the afternoon sun.

We are comforted to realize that now the trees are beginning to bud and grass is once again beginning to peak through the ground. It won't be long before we can once again walk barefoot through the grass, hike the trails, both old and new, and feel comfortable in our favorite manner of dress at our favorite place to relax.

We have a wonderful summer planned and already there are many new people looking forward to enjoying it with us. We have a full calendar of events planned for this summer. Be sure to share our plans with others who may enjoy what we all take for granted.

Nature is beautiful at every time of the year. Somehow, it seems particularly beautiful when the trees are in leaf and flowers are in bloom. We look forward to it.
