Once In A Blue Moon

We don't know where the expression came from but we do know when it will next happen. It doesn't happen often ... But the next one happens at the end of this month.

We are, of course, talking about that rare occurrence when there are two full moons in a single month. This month, we have our first full moon on the 1st. We enjoy a Blue Moon on the 31st.

This blue moon occurs at the outset of Labor Day weekend. What a wonderful coincidence!

Traditionally, Labor Day marks the end of our "season" (if there is such a thing at our special place). Oh, we fully expect to enjoy a few more pleasant weekends but we know leaves will be falling soon and temperatures will make outdoor nudity less appealing.

What still seems like an endless summer, this year, is surly coming to a conclusion. But, not without some wonderful activities planned for August.

It starts on the 4th with our Home Brew competition. If you practice the fine art of brewing your own, bring some samples to see how other eduners rate your effort.

Then, on August 11, we have our final Open House of the year. We all have friends curious about our chosen lifestyle. Invite them to experience it for themselves.

August 18 is our Wine & Cheese tasting. See the separate article for more information on this event.

Throughout the month, we will have certified massage therapists on hand offering their services on every Saturday. We encourage all Eduners to negotiate their own deals to enjoy the relaxation they offer.

It only happens once in a blue moon. It happens in August!

Wine And Cheese Tasting

Fine wine is appreciated by people everywhere. And, it is produced in many countries around the world. We understand there are vintners in all 50 states. That would include Kansas.

On August 18, Eduners will be able to share their favorite wine and cheese with others and experience the favorites others bring.

The event begins at 6 pm and will continue until all the wine and cheese is consumed or everyone has passed out.

Price of admission: 1 bottle of wine and one block of cheese. You will be expected to explain why you choose the wine and cheese and what to look for when tasting it. If anyone feels inclined to recite a poem or provide background music, that would be welcome, but not necessary.

We are anxious to learn about the choices other Eduners make regarding their favorite wines and cheeses.

Report On July Activities

Although July was typically hot, it did not seem to deter our supporters from enjoying a busy month at our special place.

Our July Open House saw a number of new faces. We were surprised most waited until nearly 3 before they ventured down the trail. Evidently, they did not wish to endure the obligatory clothing-required period of the Open House. Hey! Visitors may come anytime. No need to await an open house.

That evening, Carl led a drum circle with more percussion instruments that we have seen collected in one place at one time. Everyone seemed to enjoy the experience. We imagine they will be even better prepared for the next one.

Tie dye is always sure to please. Jon was a good sport and filled in to lead the event. It is a chance to be creative. Everyone who tried it left with something truly original.

Astronomy that evening was planned for an evening with no moon. Thus, many of the planets and the stars that decorate a summer Kansas sky were clear. Carl, provided expertise and a telescope through which we could see the rings of Saturn and other heavenly wonders.

The month concluded with a visit from our friendly dermatologist who screened everyone. Some left with spots they should watch; most were given a good report. Everyone was able to have their questions and concerns answered.

Of course, we enjoyed a movie on the big screen every Saturday evening. Thanks to those who brought an offering.

"With a little inner pirouette of excitement I realised just how much there was to look forward to tomorrow. The thought of being all day naked in the sun was delicious enough in itself, but there was the whole of our new world to explore." Lucy Irvine, Cast-away

Our First Visit To Lake Edun

by Edison Bruce

My wife Christine and I visited Lake Edun for the first time last weekend, and we were completely awed by the experience. Since this was also our first visit to a clothing-free location of any kind, we were excited and a bit nervous. We are usually nude at home, and are accustomed to performing daily activities without clothes, but we had never had the opportunity to do so in a social environment.

We were a little anxious as we walked to the barn and checked in, but within five minutes we felt completely at home. We transferred our camping gear to the grounds by South beach, got undressed and set up camp. We worked up quite a sweat from raising the tent and blowing up our mattress and floating tubes, so we went straight to the water. It was the clearest and cleanest lake we have ever swam in. We could have stayed in the water for hours. After swimming, we met people who were long-time attendees as well as first-time visitors. Of all the camps, barbecues, or outings in general, I have never found a group of people as friendly and approachable as the folks at Lake Edun. We were welcomed as though we were a part of a family. Everything about the whole trip exceeded my expectations, and I cannot over-state how amazingly pleased we are with everything.

Strangely, the thing that struck us as the most profound about the whole trip was not being at Lake Edun, but rather what it was like after we left. On the drive home, suddenly my shirt felt like it weighed a hundred pounds. Our skin couldn't breathe, and we felt awkward and constricted. It served to show just how free and natural clothes-free living is, and the obsession and requirement of clothing in our world seems kind of silly.

In the end, we completely enjoyed our weekend there and are planning on more trips in the future. :)

I Can Help; I Will Help ...

You know the cliché, many hands make light work? They also make the job go faster. The truth is, there are a lot of jobs that have to be done by someone to keep Lake Edun functioning. That's why we have volunteer work days to assist in getting the grounds and lake ready for the season and to close it down for the winter.

Being a naturist is special and we have a special place we can go to experience our favorite dress code. Since we are a small organization, members and visitors can experience a sense of investment and ownership in keeping our special place going and growing for years to come by volunteering to help out.

For instance, after all these years Maxine is feeling she needs a break. She has been the e-mail voice for Lake Edun for many years and many of us feel she is irreplaceable, but time moves on. She would love for someone to fill her digital shoes for awhile. Contact us if you would be interested.

Social media is the fastest, least expensive way to make our presence known to others who might either be interested in naturism, or become acquainted with naturism for the first time. We would really appreciate having someone take the task of updating our Face Book page. If you have the know-how, we eagerly await your making yourself known to us.

We have a board of directors who do much of the planning and work about the affairs of running Lake Edun. We have a lot of new members who undoubtedly have fresh ideas and enthusiasm. There are positions to fill that are important to maintaining a healthy and vibrant organization. Please consider accepting a position on the board.

One other thing. Anyone can take a bit of time to write a short e-mail to tell others what a great experience you had at the lake. Sharing a good word about Lake Edun is a welcome 'thank you' to everyone whose hard work helped make someone else's day better.

Talk up Lake Edun. Invite friends. Make Lake Edun your own Special Place. [Ed.]

Free At Last, Free At Last!

Stephen Gough, a former Royal Marine, has been released from prison after serving six years for his refusal to wear any clothes. Dubbed the naked Rambler, the 53 year old was first detained by police in 2003 when he attempted to make the walk from Land's End in England to John O'Groats in Scotland, completely nude. Long time Bare Facts readers will recall we documented his ordeal many years ago.

Following his arrest, he has spent the last six years in prison. His arrest for public nudity didn't earn him a six year prison term, but being released and promptly being re-arrested multiple times did. Gough was freed from Perth Prison on Tuesday. The police spoke with him briefly outside the prison, but did not arrest him, for once.

Gough was positive about the turn-around from the authorities: "My opinion is that the police have thought the guy's not going to give up so let's have a think about it. Something has changed and it is good for me."

The Chief Inspector of police said "We have been working closely with our partners in law enforcement and the individual concerned in an effort to resolve this impasse.

In prison, Gough spent much of his sentence in solitary confinement, kept away from many other prisoners and given only half an hour to shower and walk up and down the hall.

The cost of repeatedly arresting, sentencing and jailing Gough has been estimated to be over $780,000.

Gough is keen to continue with his naked walking though, in spite of the troubles he has faced. He describes his stance towards no clothes as being about "individual freedom" and added that he had no regrets:

"To conform with everyone else is the easiest way, but when you conform you compromise your principles. I am not going to give up. Stay naked is the word."

Here is a shining example of rugged individualism. Good for Steve and shame on the Scots. The police were solely out to force Mr. Gough to conform. This was an arrogant abuse of police power that finally cost the taxpayer so much wasted money that he was released. This "impasse" could have been resolved six years ago in this same manner if personal egos by police had been reined in by the political leadership.

You'll find the complete story here.

Walt Whitman

“Never before did I get so close to Nature; never before did she come so close to me...Nature was naked, and I was also...Sweet, sane still Nakedness in Nature! – ah if poor, sick, prurient humanity in cities might really know you once more! Is not nakedness indecent? No, not inherently. It is your thought, your sophistication, your fear, your respectability, that is indecent. There come moods when these clothes of ours are not only too irksome to wear, but are themselves indecent.”

I'm not sure when Whitman, (1819-1892) wrote these lines, possibly in 1877. That's 135 years ago. It's also 25 or more years before the birth of the modern naturist movement in Germany.

Despite the years, how clearly he understood the essence of naturism and the tyranny of conventional thinking about clothing. He quite correctly understood the psychological barriers preventing most in society from embracing naturism.

The body isn't indecent; it's our thoughts that falsely make it so. Like Whitman, how well modern naturists can agree with his exclamation that there is nothing more sweet than being naked in nature and that there are times when clothes are irksome to wear.

Truly Whitman was a visionary who not only imagined a new way of seeing nature, but also live it in his naked ramblings. He was able to translate to us his insights in his writings and poetry, passing on to us a sense of his mystic connection with nature.

Whitman obviously shared the outlook held by the romantic movement in Europe in his belief that in nature wretched, city-bound humanity discovers healing and renewal. While we moderns may not ascribe to nature the soaring powers of healing proclaimed in early naturism, we do agree that being nude in nature has restorative qualities.

Walking the trails west of the lake is ever a delight. To experience the freedom of bare skin while among the trees and open grassland produces a sense of oneness with the landscape that doesn't occur while clothed. With no artifact of human manufacture between you and the natural world grants a sense of connectedness with nature.

Being free of clothing removes the last remnant of feeling armored and protected. Somehow the senses seem more alert and our vulnerability is made abundantly clear. With only our skin, we are no longer the masters, but become a part of the landscape. Our dependency on our “things” in normal life starkly contrasts with the simplicity of nakedness in nature.

As naturists, we have the option of living in both worlds. With this comes a changed perspective toward our body, the bodies of others, and the world of clothing and possessions. That other world of possessions has its place, but the naturist discovers that its values no longer are as defining and all encompassing as once believed.

To become a naturist changes us in our perspective on the world in which we live. I think for the better. [Ed.]

In The News

On July 18, 2012, an Oregon man kept his clothes on when he went through court security on his way to his trial, unlike the episode that got him there: stripping at Portland's airport to protest security measures he found invasive.

On Wednesday, a judge ruled that the defendant did not break the law when he stripped down at PDX back in April. The judge ruled that the nudity was an act of protected speech.

On April 17, the intrepid traveler arrived at PDX intending to take a business trip. When he reached the gate, he declined to go through the airport's body scanners, instead choosing the alternative metal detector and body pat-down. After the pat-down, the TSA officer detected nitrates on the gloves he used to check the passenger.

“For me, time slowed down,” he said. “I thought about nitrates and I thought about the Oklahoma City bombing.” Before his trial after months of angst every time he went through security, the nitrate detection was the final straw for him, a wordless accusation that he was a terrorist.

So he took off all his clothes.

“I was mostly motivated by the absurdity of it all. The irony that they want to see me naked, but I don't get to take my clothes off,” he said. “You have all these machines that pretend to do it.”

The prosecutor said if nudity is considered protected by the First Amendment, then anyone who is arrested while nude can also claim that their actions are a protest.

However the judge didn't buy it, saying the trial is not about the process of TSA searches, but simply about whether nudity is protected free speech.

The law says that naked people are only breaking the law if they're having sex in public or got undressed “with the intent of arousing the sexual desire” of another person.

As the defendant left the stand Wednesday, he said his protest was also intended to give the TSA an idea of the effect its policies had on travelers, especially the body-scanners that produce images of passengers without clothes on.

“I wanted to show them it's a two-way street,” he said. “I don't like a naked picture of me being available.”

The complete story is here.

Anyone who has flown a number of times in the last several years can sympathize with this passenger who finally had had enough. At the same time, we don't want any more 9-11's. It's a tough balancing act.

This being said, having personally been subjected to “random searches,” or witnessed others going through ridiculous searches that defied common sense, I can understand the protester. I like the chutzpah displayed by this passenger which is in the grandest of American traditions going back to 1776. [Ed.]

The Body And The Uncomfortable Feeling

We all are thoroughly familiar with how our society generally thinks about public nudity. Ill at ease or uncomfortable would be the mildest of descriptions. Aghast, distraught, outraged would probably describe the reaction more likely to be expressed.

Still, images of nudity are all around us in media of anonymous models or entertainment figures. Someone seems to think that a whole lot of people like to look at the nude folks. Certainly the editors of ESPN Magazine do as they have an annual “Body” issue with nude photos of some of the world’s elite athletes posing in the buff.

The nudity found in the Body Issue probably more closely emulates the ideals of the ancient Greeks toward the athletic body than just about any other media source. The caveat being that the Greeks unashamedly revealed the entire body, breasts and genitals proudly displayed. ESPN has to artfully cover “the naughty parts.”

One of the athletes’ photographed nude was Abby Wambach who is on the US Olympic soccer team. The hometown sports writer took the occasion to express his discomfort at seeing Abby nude.

He wasn’t mean or shrill, just uncomfortable in the sense of, “Too much information!” He thinks it was a mistake. He insinuates that her nudity is a negative role model for her legions of impressionable young fans.

He goes on to explain that, Wambach’s photos in ESPN The Magazine’s “Body Issue” of 27 great sports figures showing off their great figures are in terrific taste, with the photographer clicking at just the right time an arm or hand was covering up what Grandma called “your naughty parts.”

They rise to the level of art..., but then comes the big BUT when he adds, “So, while celebrating the athletic form is indeed art and has been for centuries, naked is still naked and provocative is still provocative. Now we’re left to ask, “What was Abby thinking?”

Abby’s answer to this question is that, “If you’re an athlete and you’ve worked your whole life on your body, your body becomes your machine. It’s not about being a sex symbol. It’s about being proud of your body in whatever shape or form it is. We want to show people no matter who you are, no matter what shape you are, that’s still beautiful.”

So here’s the deal: Now that we’ve seen under the hood, will you ever be able to look at Abby Wambach the same away?

Did you lose respect for her or gain some? Did she cheapen herself as a role model for kids in order to appeal to an older demographic as she enters the last phases of her playing career and marketing potential, perfectly timed for the London Games? Is this just another case of sexualizing the modern athlete? Or is it a case of an empowered, intelligent woman making her own choices — something many women still don’t get to do?

Abby has been overwhelmingly supported in online comments that say she sent a positive message to young girls to follow their dreams, etc. But asks the writer, wasn’t Wambach, AP Female Athlete of the Year, already sending those messages with her clothes on?

The writer grants that Abby is an adult and can make her own decision for her career, but wonders about the future consequences, hoping they won’t come back to bite her. “It will be interesting to hear Wambach the first time a young fan asks about the pictures. I have no doubt she’ll have an intelligent response....”

Click here for the complete article.

I know the writer means well. Yet, he and millions of our fellow Americans cannot help themselves. All are locked in to a mindset that automatically sees nudity one dimensionally – it’s sex!

Even after he talks about art and his college experience in figure drawing 101, nudity equals sex is still firmly entrenched in his brain. Additionally, nudity is degrading. Abby is something of a “fallen woman” in his eyes.

As a culture, we refuse to come to terms with our physical bodies as inoffensive in and of itself. It either isn’t good enough to be seen by others, or it does sexual and therefore naughty things and shouldn’t be seen by others. Clothing then is a badge that expresses daily the shame we feel toward our bodies, and a curtain that prevents our shameful bodies from offending or enticing others.

This leaves no possible room for the celebration of the truly most finely tuned and beautiful bodies among us. What this sports writer expresses is akin to saying that all we need is a book of sports statistics for a full appreciation of athletic achievement. No need to see the athlete in action.

Whether it’s the Greeks statuary, paintings on pottery, or ESPN, the intention is to elevate our thinking. Both attempt to portray for us the nobility of the human body and heighten our respect for the sacrifice and striving for excellence embodied in the athlete. The motive is to excite awe and wonder within us to also strive for perfection and noble deeds physically, intellectually, and spiritually. [Ed.]

The Black Nativist

I bring your attention to a blog dedicated to Black Nativists. The mast head for the blog says, "Our numbers may be small by comparison, but we are out there." Oh so true.

Unfortunately, although this is labeled a blog, there are only nude pictures of black people. It would be far better to have a well thought out series of essays that argue for and explain naturism in the context of black people in America today.

Without giving an explanation that contextualizes the nudity depicted in the photographs there are minimal cues on how to "read" these photos. That is, are these just nude photographs, or are they truly depicting practicing naturists?

Judge for yourself here.

As has been discussed in the pages of Bare Facts in the past, we welcome all to Lake Edun. There have been members of color in the past. However, as the blogger says, the numbers of black naturists is small. We hope that will change. For that matter, we invite persons of all racial groups.

What better circumstance can there be than when everyone puts off their clothes and stereotyped masks to meet simply as human and get to know one another? We are on one planet. We stand or fall together. History is what has happened. The future is yet to be written. Let us write it together. [Ed.]

Being a Nativist: One Woman's Experience

I was not a very confident girl growing up. I was teased and picked on a lot to say the least. Mostly, I was just trying to scoot by under the radar at both my private Catholic grade school and later in high school. I learned one thing during that time: to wait this out. That is what I did. I waited.

It felt like forever at the time, but it ended and I became an adult. I had a care-taking job. I worked holidays, and all week long. Still something was missing. I had a job I liked and I went out with friends regularly. What could it be?

It wasn't until I met my husband that I started to piece it together. He showed me the confidence that I lacked. He gave me many new experiences to try. A typical exchange between us would go something like this: he would suggest something new to do or try and I would refuse initially only to try it later and, in almost every case, love doing it!

You would think that I would be able to bypass this initial hesitation when presented with a new experience to try and that I would learn to trust that my husband knows what I will like. For the most part, I have let go of the overwhelming fear. Thanks in a very large part to being a nativist.

Like most women, my first time going to nativist club was very nerve-wrecking. A thousand questions went through my head all at once. Questions like: "What will they think of me?" "What if I stare too much?" "What if I don't like being naked in public?" "What if no one talks to me?"

If you have never been to nativist club before, you may have same thoughts that I did the first time I was nude in public. That's natural and that is fine! Everyone is nervous in new situations. Being clothing-free make everyone equal, though. There is much less competition due to the elimination of material goods.

Some tips that might help you to relax during your visit:

- Everyone there is there to be nude. They are there at the nudist club because they ENJOY being clothing-free!
- Everyone is nervous their first time being naked with others.
- No one will come on to you just because you are naked. That is against the code of conduct and all nativist clubs take great pains not to be associated with anything sexual or erotic.
- There are definite rules about bringing your mobile phones, all mobile phones have cameras now, and cameras into a nativist resort. Some resorts will let you bring them in and use them while you are there, if you get permission from the people who will be in the photograph. Other nudist resorts will not allow your mobile phones or cameras on the premises; however they may have a camera you can request to borrow from the main office instead.

I have been living the clothing optional life for about two years now. And the list of things that I have discovered both about myself and others is a bit surprising. For instance, who would have thought that taking your clothes off and baring all would result in a greater acceptance of your own body? It sounds completely crazy, but it is true for me. I have a higher level of body image approval in the short time I have been a nativist than in all the years I have spent clothed.

I have also learned that status does not matter when you are naked. No one cares if you are the highest ranking official who makes the most money or if you are experiencing extremely hard times. Being nude is the best equalizer there is. No one cares how fit you are or what kind of car you drive, those things have no place at nativist resorts.

Being nude is fun! Where else can you openly skinny dip that is socially acceptable? What's the best thing about being naked? It has to be the lack of a soaking wet swimsuit! Nativist clubs are relaxing places. Those who are at the nudist resort are there for enjoyment, not networking. Leave the office politics at the office and enjoy the company of others. Nudists are fun people! Go to a resort and make some life-long friends!

I hope that when you go to your first nudist club, you are able to relax and enjoy it as much as I have done and will continue to do in future visits. Being naked is the best thing I have ever experienced! I hope it will be the same for you!

Change Is In The Wind

Here are some interesting quotes:

“On July 9...news channel aired a news segment on the centennial celebration of the National Museum, which was to display several sculptures of renowned Italian Renaissance artists. One of them is Michelangelo's David-Apollo – not the ubiquitous David, mind you, but nude nonetheless.

“The video that accompanied the news revealed the full body of the subject but with his genitalia pixilated.

“This ‘mosaic’ effect stirred up a debate online, with most opposing the act. In a repeat broadcast, CCTV removed the mosaic but did not offer explanation either for the erstwhile cover-up or for the later change.

“The embrace of athleticism was an even stranger notion, as a strong male physique or physical power was invariably a manifestation of brute force or low-class travail.

“As a result, the naked body has been inextricably associated with obscenity.”

“One may ask: Where is the line of moral decency? The easiest way to draw the line, it seems, is whether certain body parts are visible.

“They may not realize that salacity can exude from more than the private parts of the body. The eye, the mouth, the hand gesture, the pose, all can convey a sense that the old school would consider amoral – if you know how to read it.”

“Rarely does a month go by without a controversy that involves some form of nudity.

“However, the fundamental struggle remains as a still sizable audience without proper education of fine arts fails to differentiate the art of aesthetic enjoyment and the art of arousal.”

After reading these quotes, what country do you suspect would generate these observations? If your first suspicion was that these comments reflect the situation in the United States it would be understandable. You would be wrong. It’s from an article from China. See how much we have in common with the peoples of the world?

Puritanical cultures can arise without sharing a common history or values. However, if the writer is correctly representing the changes in outlook occurring in China, we may find the Chinese becoming more body friendly than ourselves. Time will tell. As the writer suggests, “The evolution for better discernment for art and more tolerance for body image is gradual and takes many baby steps.”

The entire article is well worth the read.

“Be glad, my merry friends, and let the warm sunlight heat now heart and limb! Cast off these cold rags! Run naked on the grass, while Tom goes a-hunting!” – Tom Bombadil in J.R.R. Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings
